Should the government double the number of priority seats in Hong Kong?

Recently, there has been a heated debate over the issue of doubling the number of priority seats on MTR trains or buses. Different people have different ideas and opinions. Some think that we should give the green light to the idea, but others oppose the suggestion. From my point of view, the government should double the number of priority seats so as to help people in need, avoid misunderstanding and develop a more harmonious city.

The first reason why we should support the idea is that there are insufficient seats for the people in need. It is known that Hong Kong is a densely populated city. The public transport is crowded and nearly all seats are occupied every day. Therefore, the ones in need, like the elderly and the pregnant, cannot sit down as soon as they board. If we double the number of priority seats, the passengers will leave the seats empty. As a result, people in need can enjoy a more comfortable journey.

Another benefit of doubling the number of priority seats is that we can avoid misunderstanding. It is not rare to see someone criticized by netizens because of not offering his or her seat. However, different people have different needs. Therefore, leaving more priority seats empty can avoid the aforementioned situation and reduce social conflicts.

Also, there is no doubt that doubling the number of priority seats can help us develop a harmonious society. It is believed that offering our seats to the needy is our obligation. However, the seat-offering culture in Hong Kong has not reached a satisfactory level. Hence, doubling the number of priority seats can enhance the awareness of offering seats to people with special needs so as to cultivate a caring culture in our society.

To conclude, doubling the number of priority seats can give a helping hand to those in need and cultivate the seat-offering culture. With our concerted effort, it is hoped that the related parties can act in a prompt manner to deal with this issue.
